Donaldson dominated everything in the seven-acre lot and he surely had the angora of the Artesian lads. His frugality was exasperating, a double by Cass in the third, Dugan's single in the fifth and Pratt's rap to open the ninth was the extent of his liberality. Only once was he in the slightest danger and then he found time to grin. He may have crunched his wad of wax a little harder, he may have thought a little faster but the first inning, his troublesome era, passed without a tally—thanks to his second baseman. Cass drove a boundary to "Don" who smote it with his glove and it rolled on to second. It was recovered and slammed to first who let it slip through and Cass pulled up at second. McGrath breezed while Pratt sacrificed sending Cass to third. Cramer cracked a line drive over second but the bulky keystoneer robbed onto it with a one-hand stab for the third out. From that point on Donaldson devoted his time to whiffing all comers and succeeded eleven times. He gave one walk.
